

Testimony Before the Kansas House Judiciary Committee
In Support of House Bill 2606
February 13, 2024

My name is Greg Glod, and I am the Senior Fellow for Public Safety and Criminal Justice at Americans for Prosperity (AFP). I want to thank Senator Warren and the rest of the Committee for allowing me to speak in support of HB 2606, a bill that will 1) eliminate unnecessary and costly government red tape; 2) provide great protections for innocent property owners; and 3) allow law enforcement to effectively seize and forfeit property obtained (or used to obtain) through criminal acts.

While HB 2606 will unlikely leave all or any interested parties completely satisfied, it was certainly not composed in haste or without their input deeply considered and often incorporated. Previous iterations of reform to asset forfeiture have been debated in both chambers for years now, while special joint committees have brought experts, law enforcement, impacted citizens, and others together with the goal drafting legislation that takes into account a wide range of perspectives, lessons from other states, and data.¹ In other words, the Kansans legislature has done their homework and AFP applauds this body and all the organizations and individuals who have stayed dedicated to how the Kansas government can currently take your property away without ever convicting or charging you with a crime.

During this thoughtful and extensive legislative endeavor, many of the problem areas with how the current forfeiture laws are constructed and implemented in practice were clear, including:²

- The vast majority of seizures involve minimal amounts of value. 62 percent of seizures are valued at $5,000 or less;
- 79% of property owners in the Kansas Asset Seizure and Forfeiture Repository (KASFR) are still legally innocent, 90% of all seized property has been forfeited;
- For those who recovered their seized property, it took them an average of 413 days to do so; and
- For most people whose property has been seized by the government, the cost of recovering it is often greater than its value. Additionally, the low burden of proof needed for the government to take full ownership of the property (preponderance of the evidence, which is essentially 50.1% or greater) effectively places the burden on the property owner, rather than the other way around. This means even if you are legally innocent, it may not make financial sense to challenge the forfeiture and if you do, the low burden of proof makes success incredibly difficult.

¹ I testified before the Special Committee on Civil Asset Forfeiture on December 6, 2023. Written testimony presented to the Special Committee is attached to this testimony as Appendix “A” and is incorporated herein and made a part hereof by reference as if set forth in full.

² For a more detailed look at forfeiture in Kansas, please refer to Appendix “A.”

- Kansas law enforcement work with the federal government often to execute seizures and forfeitures where federal rules of forfeiture apply and 80 percent of the proceeds can be recouped by Kansas law enforcement.

HB 2606 identifies these problems and includes reforms to tackle them. The changes included in HB 2606 have been implemented in many other jurisdictions across the country and have not hurt law enforcement's effectiveness of removing the fruits of ill-gotten gains away from criminals in those areas or have seen changes exacerbate the negative consequences to substance abuse, such as overdose.

Nebraska, for example, completely ended civil forfeiture in 2016. While many proponents of the status quo claim that current policies are critical to saving lives from the harmful and deadly effects of drugs such as fentanyl, the Husker State has the lowest overdose death rate in the country, while Kansas has a rate of death more than double of that.³

After speaking with countless lawmakers and stakeholders, it became clear that although there were differences in policy, all stakeholders wanted the same thing; allow police to effectively do their job and ensure innocent property owners don't have to fight bureaucracy with one hand tied behind their back.

I thank you for allowing me to take the time to discuss AFP's support for HB 2606 and I'm happy to take any questions at the end of my oral testimony or as needed throughout the legislative process.

Sincerely,

Greg Glod

APPENDIX A

Testimony Before the Special Committee on Civil Asset Forfeiture, Kansas Legislature

Greg Glod, Senior Fellow for Public Safety & Criminal Justice, Americans for Prosperity

December 6, 2023

My name is Greg Glod, and I am the Senior Fellow for Public Safety and Criminal Justice at Americans for Prosperity (AFP). I want to thank Chair Stephen Owens and the rest of the Special Committee on Civil Asset Forfeiture for allowing me to speak on an issue that has a profound impact on all Kansans. As one of the largest grassroots organizations in the country, AFP is driving long-term solutions to some of the country's biggest problems.

Our organization, and its thousands of activists across Kansas, are dedicated to breaking barriers that stand in the way of people realizing their full potential. We believe that to achieve these goals, our criminal justice system must prioritize its resources to maximize public safety, while ensuring citizen's Constitutional rights are respected. It is for these reasons that we support reforms to current civil asset forfeiture laws that will still allow law enforcement to ensure criminals are not able to utilize or profit from their ill-gotten gains, while protecting the property rights of all Kansans.

Current Issues with Kansas Civil Forfeiture Law

The philosophy behind forfeiture is one that AFP emphatically supports: ensuring those who break the law are separated from the property used and/or gained to commit that crime. However, the current law in Kansas does not afford necessary due process protections for innocent property owners to effectively defend themselves.

It's important to remember that the process is civil, meaning protections afforded citizens in a criminal proceeding are not provided in civil forfeitures. This includes a low burden of proof (preponderance of the evidence, which is essentially "more likely than not" rather than beyond a reasonable doubt), and innocent property owners must prove their property's innocence, rather than the government. This creates an unduly burdensome and expensive process for innocent owners to get their property back from the government. Most forfeitures end in a default, meaning the individual doesn't even contest the forfeiture.

Additionally, Kansas law enforcement is allowed to keep 100% of the proceeds of a forfeiture. When law enforcement agencies significantly rely on these types of funding sources,⁴ it leaves less time for more important functions such as preventing and solving violent crimes.

Criminal Forfeiture Will Still Maintain Public Safety

Since 2014, 36 states have reformed their forfeiture laws and have shown that these changes to civil forfeiture will not impact public safety. In 2015, New Mexico passed a law that eliminated civil forfeiture, replaced it with civil forfeiture, and removed financial incentives for law enforcement agencies. An analysis⁵ of this bill shows no negative impact on crime in the state.

Additionally, a 2021 study from the Institute of Justice looked at five states (Arizona, Hawaii, Iowa, Michigan, and Minnesota) that often utilize civil forfeiture.⁶ The report found that 1) increases in forfeiture revenue do not help police solve more crimes; 2) forfeiture proceeds do not decrease illegal drug use; and 3) forfeiture activity increases as unemployment increases.

Current State of Play in Kansas

In 2018, the Kansas legislature passed K.S.A. 60-4127, requiring the Kansas Bureau of Investigation (KBI) to establish a platform for every local law enforcement agency in Kansas to report comprehensive information on every seizure and forfeiture in the state. Americans for Prosperity Foundation (AFPF) examined the data,⁷ which includes incident reports on all “completed” forfeiture actions from July 1, 2019, to December 31, 2021. In May 2022, AFPF released a report based on this data and in August 2023, updated the report to include 2022 numbers.⁸ The report found the following:

- Kansas law enforcement reported seizing $25.3 million from people in the state.
- On average, law enforcement reports taking over $17,000 per day in money and property from people in Kansas.
- KBI annual reports omit up to one-third of the total value of assets forfeited. This is because the report does not include the amount of property and cash gained from forfeiture proceedings where Kansas law enforcement hands over the property to federal authorities (known as “equitable sharing”) to initiate forfeiture proceedings. Under equitable sharing, local and state law enforcement can still keep up to 80% of the proceeds, even though federal authorities utilize their process, rather than the states. KBI data shows that the state forfeited $12.7 million but does not include an additional $5.4 million in seized assets sent to the federal government.
- Most seizures do not involve amounts that would disrupt organized crime operations. 62% of seizures have a total value of $5,000 or less.
- While 79% of owners in the Kansas Asset Seizure and Forfeiture Repository (KASFR) are still legally innocent, 90% of all seized property has been forfeited.
- For those few fortunate people who were able to recover their seized property, it took them an average of 413 days to do so.
- For most people whose property has been seized by Kansas law enforcement, the cost of recovering their property is greater than the value of the property seized. The Institute for Justice estimates that it costs roughly $3,000 to hire an attorney to challenge a simple state forfeiture case. Half of all seizures in the KASFR are for $3,000 or less.

AFP recommends that the Kansas legislature pass policies that were included in 2023's HB 2380. This legislation will not take away law enforcement's ability to seize property connected with or involved in crime and will only require them to wait until after a criminal conviction has been secured to forfeit any property they have seized. It will also take steps to conform Kansas law with the recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Timbs v. Indiana where the Court unanimously ruled that the 8th Amendment's excessive fines clause applied to a state's use of fines and forfeitures. We believe these reforms are vital to protect innocent property owners and ensure law enforcement can focus on their core mission of preventing and solving violent crime. The legislature and local governments should fully fund our law enforcement agencies so that they do not feel compelled to act as tax collectors to keep our communities safe.

I thank you again for the opportunity to discuss civil forfeiture with this esteemed body and would be happy to answer any questions today or in the future.

Sincerely,

Greg Glod
